Since 1991 Hate have lived up to their name, responsible for some of the angriest and most ruthless death metal unleashed upon the world. With 2017's "Tremendum" they took a step toward a darker, more atmospheric, black metal-oriented style and began exploring Slavonic mysticism, and new album "Auric Gates of Veles" boldly continues in that direction. "We wanted to go deeper into the subject, both musically and lyrically," asserts vocalist/guitarist ATF Sinner. "We also wanted to record a sharper and better defined rhythm section, a more death metal-oriented one. When it comes to guitar sound, it was meant to be a wall of sonic destruction with dark ambient elements in the background." To say that they achieved that which they set out to create is an understatement, for "Auric Gates of Veles" is a titanic record that is both more organic and dynamic sounding, and may well be the finest of their storied career.
