LIVE ALBUMS!

Tomorrow marks the first ever live albums released by Terratur Possessions. Are we seeing a new trend in the making? No. Are we seeing the start of a new series of releases? No. These are the only two planned for the foreseeable future.

By pure coincidence and a series of developments, these two landed on my desk at roughly the same time.

Darvaza had their material recorded at a special place with a special lineup. The result turned out great, and the band finally gets to show themselves from their best side: in a live setting. Most of us who follow this band know that the best place to experience them is live where their material truly comes to life.

What happened to our friend Barth (which had been addressed before, so no need to go into it now) occurred after this album was already in the works, so that’s also a footnote worth mentioning.

Secondly, the Misotheist album came out of the blue when the band had mixed their gig for their own pleasure, something for them to listen to. It took me three songs to realize everyone must hear this, so reluctantly the band listened to my pleas and we agreed to do a limited version, limited to the number of people who were there: 800.

So, Darvaza came to me with their material at the same time Misotheist did, and here we are some months later, both albums ready to launch: TOMORROW.

Both albums are limited, one-time pressings.
