Ten years ago, Panopticon released “Autumn Eternal” – a record that captured the fleeting fire of the season and fixed it in sound. Amber-hued and windswept, it was both a lament for change and a hymn of hope for the road ahead.

The album marked the closing chapter of the trilogy begun with “Kentucky” (2012) and carried forward with “Roads to the North” (2014). Here, Austin Lunn wove black metal with threads of Americana, folk, and post-rock into an immersive journey steeped in sadness, beauty, and transcendence. From the sweeping melancholy of “A Superior Lament” to the rustic violin of Johan Becker and the somber cello of Nostarion, “Autumn Eternal” is a meditation on loss, memory, and the passage of time.

A decade later, “Autumn Eternal” still glows with the same autumnal fire – a testament to its place as one of the most honest and affecting metal albums of its time.
