If PROFANATION's opening Skull Crushing Violence mini-album was aptly titled, then their Ultra-Noise Warfare debut album is even more so. Lead guitarist Kev Desecrator (of VENEFIXION et. al.) may've left following its recording, but this nine-song / 27-minute album absolutely DECIMATES and absolutely establishes PROFANATION as their own entity. Thankfully, their sound has hardly changed - think the unholy offspring of Hadez and Necrovore with more than a hint of the eldritch grind of Terrorizer and England's Doom - but across the entirety of Ultra-Noise Warfare do the Frenchmen exhibit a more world-eating aspect with utterly crushing aplomb. Just the sheer physicality alone, like classic Archgoat and Revenge run through an equally classic Swedeath filter, buries the listener under miles of nuclear vomit and human ashes. And while PROFANATION play with a palpitating urgency (read: ACTUAL HUMANS recorded properly without punch-ins etc), it's perhaps the album's slower moments that send the strongest shivers down the spine; every nerve alive will feel the megaton weight of the equally gargantuan (and perfectly titled) "Total Stomp" and "Realm of the Absolute."
